San Francisco, CA – A momentous and long-awaited event took place at the Macworld Expo on Tuesday morning, when Apple’s CEO, Steve Jobs, introduced the iPhone to millions of consumers.

In the hours leading up to the presentation, tech enthusiasts waited with anticipation and curiosity. No information was disclosed prior to the event, leaving rumors and speculations to increase excitement.

As Jobs took the stage, the crowd in the Moscone Center was roaring with applause. He started his monologue by saying, “Every once in a while, a revolutionary product comes along that changes everything... Today, we’re introducing three.”

He explained how Apple was introducing a “widescreen iPod with touch controls,” a “revolutionary mobile phone,” and a “breakthrough internet communicator.” After repeating these three products to the crowd multiple times, it finally clicked.

Apple was taking all three of these elements and merging them together to create a singular, game-changing device. He referred to it as the “iPhone.”

Jobs explained how the iPhone offers incredible new features, including: a touch screen, headphone jack, music and media player, 2MP camera, HTML browser with internet access, maps and satellite, widgets, text messaging and email capabilities. He added that several of these features have never been seen before with the current generation of smartphones.

Starting in June, consumers will be able to purchase their own iPhone, with a retail price starting at $499 for the 4GB model and $599 for the 8GB model.

The future is here, and thanks to Steve Jobs and the rest of the team at Apple, the future will now be accessible in households across the globe.
