CHESTER, VT - Several communities across Vermont were flooded over the weekend. Thousands of residents were trapped in their homes as water surged through many towns.

The National Weather Service warned citizens of Vermont that 3 to 9 inches of rain was expected over the next several days.

Montpelier received 5.28” of rainfall in a single day, setting a record for the state since Hurricane Irene in 2011. The town most heavily affected by these storms was Calais, in which 9.20” of rain was recorded over 48 hours.

Meteorologists said to Q30 that this storm was likely due to the location of the Green Mountains. As a result of rapid water runoff, the excess rain began to accumulate in lower elevation areas surrounding the mountain range.

Authorities warned the locals to avoid traveling where walkways were blocked off by water.

Those who live in low-elevation areas were asked to leave their homes until further notice to prevent further damage.
